

From the North American.

TUTUL XIU.

The Indians of Yucatan, when Mr. Stevens visited, for the second time, in 1842, their singular country, covered with the ruins of cities of their ancestors, presented the same appearance of mild temper, submissiveness, apathy, and disregard for the past, which were considered the proper characteristics of the Peruvians before their insurrection in 1780, under the late, Tupac Amaru; and such a degeneracy of spirit might be esteemed less extraordinary on the part of the Peruvians, a peculiarly gentle and docile race originally, than on that of the Indians of Yucatan, who three hundred years ago, were among the bravest and most warlike of all the civilized or semi-civilized tribes of America.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

The Paris correspondent of the London

Atlas relates the following marvellous story: "You would be much amused by the various gossiping stories which are about in the saloons of Paris at this moment. They remind me of all the wild rumors which were current just at the period of the first revolution, some of which have been handed down to us with such fearful exaggeration by the memoirs of the time. Among others I may quote one which I heard last night from the lips of a gentleman who described himself as an eye-witness of the whole scene, and whose character for truth is unimpeachable. The adventure happened last summer; while the whole of the ex-royal family were gathered together at Neuilly. The person who told me the story had been invited to dinner by Louis Philippe, along with Dr. B., who had been summoned to wait upon the young Duke Philippe of Wurttemberg, who had been married with an attack of the group which he has been from his birth ailingly subject. The dinner was an early one, according to the laissez aller habits of the royal family when at Neuilly, and after the report the whole company, instead of adjourning to the drawing room, strolled on upon the grass plot before the entrance to enjoy the beauty of the evening and the coolness of the setting sun after the burning heat of the day. Dr. B., in addition to his great skill in the management of children, is one of the first managers in Paris, and the conversation, as is always the case when he is present, turned upon magnificence. He told many wonderful tales, of course, concerning the clairvoyance of some of his patients, and the extraordinary power in foretelling the future of others, until, being pressed by the king, he looked around to see if any among the company bore outward signs of any great susceptibility to magnetic influence. He hesitated, when the king bade him name the person who would be most likely to be clairvoyant to the company. "There is one person present," said the doctor, "who possesses in an extraordinary degree every symptom of this peculiar faculty. Madame Lu. Princess de Joinville would, I am sure, astonish us, would she but submit to the trial. Curiosity had been much excited by the various wonderful tales of the magnetizer, and the whole of the youthful portion of the royal family united in the supplication to the princess to allow him to try his skill. After some little reluctance, connected, I believe, with religious scruples, the fair princess consented to the experiment. "She was seated, and my informant, upon a raised mound of grass, formed around the base of a wide spreading oak; she had thrown over her head the scarlet dark blue cape which she wore upon her neck, and as she leaned against the tree her pale thin features and sundown hair made her look dreamy and spiritual, a being just fitted to hold communion with another world. In a moment, and I believe with no other ceremony than the placing of his thumb against hers, she realized the doctor's prevision, and fell into a deep magnetic slumber as it was possible to witness. There was a deep silence among the persons gathered there, and the doctor having addressed a few questions to her, returned to demand which member of the family would like to consult her in the name of the rest. Madame Adelaide (since dead) it was volunteered, and to her questioning did the patient reply with such truth concerning the past that she felt emboldened to consult her with regard to the future. I give you my honor as a gentleman," added my informant, "that in that scene every event which has happened with such fearful rapidity to astonish and confound us all was foretold with most awful precision. The day, the hour of the flight was named, as well as the despoilment of the Tuilleries; the securing of the diamonds once belonging to the crown of the Emperor by a person about the court, (they have not been found); and a second catastrophe, not far distant, and which concerns the Orleans family alone. "You name me not, said Madame Adelaide, with whom am I to fly? "You will remain calm, and peacefully in France," replied the somnambule, at which observation the king laughed and said that this last prophecy was sufficient to betray the fallacy of the whole, as his sister would be incapable of deserting them in the hour of peril. I have heard the story from two or three individuals, and from one who declares himself to have been an eye-witness to the scene, and have no reason to doubt its accuracy."

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

When the Spaniards first discovered Yucatan, in the beginning of the 16th century, they were surprised to find it densely occupied by a people who were clad in woven garments; who cultivated the earth—like those who lived in towns and cities built chiefly of stone, with palaces, temples, pyramids, and a variety of other works of art; and who, in the midst of a barbarous and uncivilized life, displayed a taste and extraordinary style of architecture, wholly unlike any other style—out of America, at least—in the known world, and divided into petty states or principalities—caciquas, as the Spaniards called them—each ruled by an independent hereditary chief, who was a monarch within his little domain. All the inhabitants, however, were of one race, calling themselves Macaguas, and their country, Maya; to this day, the Indians know no other names. About a century before the Spaniards came, the whole peninsula formed a single kingdom, the metropolis of which was Mayapan, whose ruins are still in existence, and whose magnificent temples, and other works of art, were destroyed by a revolution, in which the petty princes united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas. Divided as they were, however, they met the bearded invaders with a spirit which surprised the latter as much—and far more distinguished—their valor, and the Spaniards found them, in the midst of their divisions, united their arms against the ruling power, and established the separate independence of their caciquas.

Corner of State &amp; Elm Sts. New Albany Ia.

JENNINGS & SON, would inform the public that they have just received a superior lot of Italian, American and Indiana Marble, which they will sell wholesale or retail, on the most reasonable terms. They keep constantly on hand a large assortment of Monument, Headstones, &c., which will be sold cheaper than any thing of the kind ever brought or sold in the State of Indiana. Letting done in the neatest manner and on the most reasonable terms. Orders from the interior promptly attended to. Also, orders from persons along the river will receive prompt attention, and their work delivered at the wharf at New Albany, free of charge, may 23-1m

J. DANFORTH &amp; SON.

WHOLESALE DEALERS IN FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC

DRY GOODS.

No. 444, Main St. Louisville, Ky. [m2]

W. C. PETERS &amp; CO.

MUSIC PUBLISHERS.

No. 507 Main Street, Louisville, Ky.

(NEXT DOOR TO THE BANK OF LOUISVILLE.)

CONSTANTLY ON HAND, double and single Action Harps, Musical Instruments, and every variety of Music, bound in the strongest manner.

Selling and tuning—do, and second hand pianos purchased, sold, or exchanged.

Seminaries supplied with Music at a liberal discount.

J. H. MAGHEE &amp; CO.

Agents of the

BONHABOUR MINING AND MANUFACTURING CO.

HAYES

6000 Dds. Cotton Yarn.

They are authorized to sell at Louisville prices all their goods.

These yarns are of excellent quality, and superior to most of the Pittsburgh Brands. Please call and examine them.

P. W. BIRB, PROPRIETOR.

Opposite the Washington Hall, 5th St. between Main and Market.

J. H. INGLE, JR., ATTORNEY AT LAW.

ATTORNEYS AT LAW, SUCCESSORS TO WHEELER &amp; INGLE, General Collection and Real Estate Agency, 111 N. 2d St., Louisville, Ky. [m2]

HARDWARE.

CLAGETT &amp; MILLER.

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in Foreign and Domestic Hardware.

Cutlery, Guns and Fancy Goods.

No. 525, Main Street, Louisville, Kentucky.

Daily receiving additions to their Spring Importations, embracing one of the largest and best assorted Stocks ever offered in this market.

Our stock of Table and Pocket Cutlery stands pre-eminent in point of variety, and at prices which defy competition in the East or West.

Our assortment of household and office furniture, direct from the Manufacturers in England and America, at the lowest figure, and have been selected with great care, and are of the most durable and cost choice styles of Goods, which we guarantee to All upon the most favorable terms.

Having extended our acquaintance with the European and American Manufacturers, we are enabled to offer purchasers advantages superior to any former year.

An examination of our stock is respectfully solicited. [Feb. 29-30m]

LOUISVILLE KY., Feb. 24th 1848.

ADMINISTRATORS Sale of Real Estate.

By virtue of an order of the Probate Court of Vanderburgh County, made at the May term, 1848, of said Court, the undersigned, the undersigned, do hereby give notice, that on the 1st day of June, 1848, at 10 o'clock A. M., of said day, at the door of the Court House in the City of Evansville, Indiana, at public auction, the following described real estate, to-wit: The south west quarter of section number six, south of range number ten west, and ten acres in the north east corner of the east half of the South west quarter of section number eighteen in Township number six, south of range number nine west, in Vanderburgh County, Indiana.

Also—The following tracts of land subject to the life estate of the widow, the same being set apart by the Probate Court, of Vanderburgh County, for her dower, namely: The south east quarter of the south west quarter of section number twenty-four, in Township number six, south of range number ten west, and ten acres in the north east corner of the east half of the South west quarter of section number eighteen in Township number six, south of range number nine west, in Vanderburgh County, Indiana.

TERMS OF SALE.—One third of the purchase money in cash, one third in one year, and the balance in two years, the purchaser to give bond for the payment of the balance of the purchase money, with approved security, waiving all benefit from valuation and appraisement laws.

JAMES T. WALKER, Adm'r.

EXECUTORS Sale of Real Estate.

By virtue of an order of the Vanderburgh Probate Court, made at the May term, 1848, of said Court, the undersigned